Dear Senator Lehman:

I have written to you a few times in the past on various subjects. Recently I have been thinking of proposed legislative action, if sponsored by the Democratic Party, which might result in untold numbers of people voting for the Democratic in the coming November presidential election.

With the trend toward aiding the worker, and thus the economy of the state and the country, as indicated by New York State's anti-discrimination law and the Taft-Hartley Act, I was wondering why a national - or at least a New York State law - eliminating discrimination against people over 35 years of age by employers, were not proposed by the appropriate governmental bodies. (Just glance through the want ads of metropolitan New York papers for evidence of)

Such practice in such practice to be considered "democratic"? With statistics of various sources - including those of the Department of Labor - showing an increasing life span of the average American citizen, disregard of this fact can only harm the country in the long run.

Yours sincerely,

Paul Sachs
