Four Distinguished Columbia College Alumni Receive John Jay Award

Hollyarty, director of the human rights advocate training program, is the president of the Human Rights and Human Rights Advocacy Institute, a non-profit organization that provides training and resources to human rights advocates around the world. The Institute was founded in 1996 to provide a comprehensive training program for human rights advocates from around the world. The program includes both in-person and online courses, and has been attended by over 2,500 participants from over 200 countries.

The Institute's training program is designed to provide advocates with the skills and knowledge they need to effectively advocate for human rights. The program covers a wide range of topics, including human rights law, international law, human rights advocacy strategies, and human rights research and reporting.

The Institute also offers a range of other programs, including a human rights fellowship program, a human rights advocacy training program, and a human rights advocacy mentoring program. The fellowship program provides opportunities for human rights activists to work with leading human rights organizations and learn from experienced human rights advocates.

The advocacy training program provides in-depth training in human rights advocacy, and includes both a four-month non-degree program and a one-month intensive program. The mentoring program provides one-on-one mentorship for human rights advocates from around the world.

The Institute's programs are funded through a combination of grants, donations, and fees. The Institute is committed to providing access to training and resources to human rights advocates from a wide range of backgrounds and countries.
