Journalism School students who registered for the photojournalism skills workshop this fall got an intense introduction to the profession. Not only were they the first students to experience the expanded seven week workshop (instead of one day), but only a week into the course, they were sent out to capture New York City on film after the World Trade Center was attacked. Freelance photographer and workshop instructor, Sara Barrett, said it was an experience these journalism students weren’t likely to forget. The photos here represent their work.
