The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks claimed the lives of at least 39 Columbia alumni, many of them executives in banking, securities, insurance and management consulting. The victims also included two members of the 2001 graduating class: Tyler Ugolyn, 23, and Joshua Birnbaum, 24, who received their bachelor's degrees last May and began their first jobs in the World Trade Center only weeks before the attacks.

Other alumni who died include Douglas Karpiloff, the Port Authority security executive at the World Trade Center; Richard Gabriel, a decorated Vietnam veteran and founder of a management consulting firm; Weibin Wang, a gifted geophysicist from China who had switched to a high-tech computer career and recently bought a suburban home for his growing family; and Arlene Fried, the daughter of Holocaust survivors who returned to school to earn a law degree after the youngest of her three daughters started school.

Most of the victims worked on the upper floors of the Twin Towers as investment bankers, lawyers, securities analysts, management consultants and computer technology researchers and analysts. Ten employees worked for the Cantor Fitzgerald brokerage firm and were among hundreds of the firm's employees who were trapped on the 101st to 105th floors of the north tower after the first airplane hit the building. Two alumni were passengers on the hijacked planes that crashed into the Pentagon and near the World Trade Center.

The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks claimed the lives of at least 39 Columbia alumni, many of them executives in banking, securities, insurance and management consulting. The victims also included two members of the 2001 graduating class: Tyler Ugolyn, 23, and Joshua Birnbaum, 24, who received their bachelor's degrees last May and began their first jobs in the World Trade Center only weeks before the attacks.

Other alumni who died include Douglas Karpiloff, the Port Authority security executive at the World Trade Center; Richard Gabriel, a decorated Vietnam veteran and founder of a management consulting firm; Weibin Wang, a gifted geophysicist from China who had switched to a high-tech computer career and recently bought a suburban home for his growing family; and Arlene Fried, the daughter of Holocaust survivors who returned to school to earn a law degree after the youngest of her three daughters started school.

Most of the victims worked on the upper floors of the Twin Towers as investment bankers, lawyers, securities analysts, management consultants and computer technology researchers and analysts. Ten employees worked for the Cantor Fitzgerald brokerage firm and were among hundreds of the firm's employees who were trapped on the 101st to 105th floors of the north tower after the first airplane hit the building. Two alumni were passengers on the hijacked planes that crashed into the Pentagon and near the World Trade Center.

The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks claimed the lives of at least 39 Columbia alumni, many of them executives in banking, securities, insurance and management consulting. The victims also included two members of the 2001 graduating class: Tyler Ugolyn, 23, and Joshua Birnbaum, 24, who received their bachelor's degrees last May and began their first jobs in the World Trade Center only weeks before the attacks.

Other alumni who died include Douglas Karpiloff, the Port Authority security executive at the World Trade Center; Richard Gabriel, a decorated Vietnam veteran and founder of a management consulting firm; Weibin Wang, a gifted geophysicist from China who had switched to a high-tech computer career and recently bought a suburban home for his growing family; and Arlene Fried, the daughter of Holocaust survivors who returned to school to earn a law degree after the youngest of her three daughters started school.

Most of the victims worked on the upper floors of the Twin Towers as investment bankers, lawyers, securities analysts, management consultants and computer technology researchers and analysts. Ten employees worked for the Cantor Fitzgerald brokerage firm and were among hundreds of the firm's employees who were trapped on the 101st to 105th floors of the north tower after the first airplane hit the building. Two alumni were passengers on the hijacked planes that crashed into the Pentagon and near the World Trade Center.

The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks claimed the lives of at least 39 Columbia alumni, many of them executives in banking, securities, insurance and management consulting. The victims also included two members of the 2001 graduating class: Tyler Ugolyn, 23, and Joshua Birnbaum, 24, who received their bachelor's degrees last May and began their first jobs in the World Trade Center only weeks before the attacks.

Other alumni who died include Douglas Karpiloff, the Port Authority security executive at the World Trade Center; Richard Gabriel, a decorated Vietnam veteran and founder of a management consulting firm; Weibin Wang, a gifted geophysicist from China who had switched to a high-tech computer career and recently bought a suburban home for his growing family; and Arlene Fried, the daughter of Holocaust survivors who returned to school to earn a law degree after the youngest of her three daughters started school.

Most of the victims worked on the upper floors of the Twin Towers as investment bankers, lawyers, securities analysts, management consultants and computer technology researchers and analysts. Ten employees worked for the Cantor Fitzgerald brokerage firm and were among hundreds of the firm's employees who were trapped on the 101st to 105th floors of the north tower after the first airplane hit the building. Two alumni were passengers on the hijacked planes that crashed into the Pentagon and near the World Trade Center.

The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks claimed the lives of at least 39 Columbia alumni, many of them executives in banking, securities, insurance and management consulting. The victims also included two members of the 2001 graduating class: Tyler Ugolyn, 23, and Joshua Birnbaum, 24, who received their bachelor's degrees last May and began their first jobs in the World Trade Center only weeks before the attacks.

Other alumni who died include Douglas Karpiloff, the Port Authority security executive at the World Trade Center; Richard Gabriel, a decorated Vietnam veteran and founder of a management consulting firm; Weibin Wang, a gifted geophysicist from China who had switched to a high-tech computer career and recently bought a suburban home for his growing family; and Arlene Fried, the daughter of Holocaust survivors who returned to school to earn a law degree after the youngest of her three daughters started school.

Most of the victims worked on the upper floors of the Twin Towers as investment bankers, lawyers, securities analysts, management consultants and computer technology researchers and analysts. Ten employees worked for the Cantor Fitzgerald brokerage firm and were among hundreds of the firm's employees who were trapped on the 101st to 105th floors of the north tower after the first airplane hit the building. Two alumni were passengers on the hijacked planes that crashed into the Pentagon and near the World Trade Center.

The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks claimed the lives of at least 39 Columbia alumni, many of them executives in banking, securities, insurance and management consulting. The victims also included two members of the 2001 graduating class: Tyler Ugolyn, 23, and Joshua Birnbaum, 24, who received their bachelor's degrees last May and began their first jobs in the World Trade Center only weeks before the attacks.

Other alumni who died include Douglas Karpiloff, the Port Authority security executive at the World Trade Center; Richard Gabriel, a decorated Vietnam veteran and founder of a management consulting firm; Weibin Wang, a gifted geophysicist from China who had switched to a high-tech computer career and recently bought a suburban home for his growing family; and Arlene Fried, the daughter of Holocaust survivors who returned to school to earn a law degree after the youngest of her three daughters started school.

Most of the victims worked on the upper floors of the Twin Towers as investment bankers, lawyers, securities analysts, management consultants and computer technology researchers and analysts. Ten employees worked for the Cantor Fitzgerald brokerage firm and were among hundreds of the firm's employees who were trapped on the 101st to 105th floors of the north tower after the first airplane hit the building. Two alumni were passengers on the hijacked planes that crashed into the Pentagon and near the World Trade Center.