HEALTHCARE

COMMUNITY IMMUNIZATION EFFORT

The Record

September 27, 2004

For centuries, physicians have worn white coats as a symbol of the healing profession. At 8:00 a.m. on Aug. 25, 2004, 140 students received their white medical coat and recited the Hippocratic Oath for the first time. The ceremony, which was held at the Columbia Medical School, is the first of its kind at Columbia, and is the first step in the process of becoming a physician.

The ceremony was a significant moment for the students, who have been preparing for this day for many years. It is also an important event for the Columbia Medical School, as it marks the beginning of the students' journey towards becoming a physician.

The ceremony was attended by faculty, family and friends of the students, as well as members of the medical community. The event was a celebration of the students' hard work and dedication, and a symbol of the commitment they are making to the field of medicine.

During the ceremony, the students were given their white coats and were led in the Hippocratic Oath, a pledge that has been recited by medical students for centuries. The oath is a promise to uphold the values of the medical profession, and to treat all patients with dignity and respect.

The ceremony was a highlight of the First Year Orientation at the Columbia Medical School, which is a time when the students are introduced to the medical community and to each other. It is also a time for the students to begin to build relationships with their classmates, and to start to think about the future as a physician.

The First Year Orientation is an important part of the medical school experience, and is a time when the students are able to think about the challenges and opportunities that lie ahead. It is also a time when the students are able to start to build a sense of community, which is important for their success as physicians.

The First Year Orientation is a time of change and growth for the students, and is a time of excitement and anticipation. It is a time when the students are able to think about the future, and to start to imagine what it will be like to be a physician.