According to a UNICEF study, "over one billion children—over half of all youth—live in countries that are severely deprived of basic human rights, and are particularly vulnerable to trafficking in human beings. These children are at risk of being exploited and are often the silent victims of armed conflict, particularly children who are displaced within their countries or who are displaced across the borders of their countries and have become refugees." The answer is that not simple. Yet the last decade, the international community has made some important strides in helping the most unfortunate and vulnerable refugees. Through vehicles such as the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, there has been a mandate by more than 100 nations, and the appointment of a Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children of Armed Conflict. Much more must be done to recognize the special circumstances of humanitarian crises currently putting millions of children in peril. Levine implied one of the most precious and serious crises in the world, refugees, who, the government's forces have initiated an ethnic cleansing campaign to wipe out the entire ethnic region. "Darfur, unfortunately, illustrates what happens when a humanitarian crisis and a conflict happen in a place that is marginal, where skilled workers are still in place. Often, these roadblocks pose a dan- "The Waste-to-Energy Research and Technology Council (WTERC), an international group of engi-
