On Black History Month

I think any successful people are always a people who know something about their history. If people do not tell their story, then they are either going to be left out of the overall human story or the American story. If we do not tell it, then no one else is going to be able to tell it for us, certainly not in the way in which we have lived it and experienced it.

And one way we have been telling our story—and most people who have been struggling for justice around the world often refer to the African American story—are the stories we tell in Black History Month. It is not just in February, but tell it year-round.

I think any successful people are always a people who know something about their history. If people do not tell their story, then they are either going to be left out of the overall human story or the American story. If we do not tell it, then no one else is going to be able to tell it for us, certainly not in the way in which we have lived it and experienced it.

And one way we have been telling our story—and most people who have been struggling for justice around the world often refer to the African American story—are the stories we tell in Black History Month. It is not just in February, but tell it year-round.

I think any successful people are always a people who know something about their history. If people do not tell their story, then they are either going to be left out of the overall human story or the American story. If we do not tell it, then no one else is going to be able to tell it for us, certainly not in the way in which we have lived it and experienced it.

And one way we have been telling our story—and most people who have been struggling for justice around the world often refer to the African American story—are the stories we tell in Black History Month. It is not just in February, but tell it year-round.

I think any successful people are always a people who know something about their history. If people do not tell their story, then they are either going to be left out of the overall human story or the American story. If we do not tell it, then no one else is going to be able to tell it for us, certainly not in the way in which we have lived it and experienced it.

And one way we have been telling our story—and most people who have been struggling for justice around the world often refer to the African American story—are the stories we tell in Black History Month. It is not just in February, but tell it year-round.