SCREENSHOTS OF THE GRAYMATTER WEBSITE

Compiled Fall 2012

Here are some screenshots of our tech team’s work. We designed and developed the website in-house, with some guidance from professional engineers and designers.

About

We empower anyone to deliver needed educational resources to NYC public high schoolers.

How we started
In 2010, Jeremy Meyers and Shah Ullah were New York City public high schoolers contemplating the massive budget cuts New York State and City had planned for their public schools.

While both the State and City spend billions on education, the planned cuts were targeting the classes and extra-curricular activities students need and enjoy.

Even aside from harmful budget cuts, New York City public schools have many problems. Our students need resources and GrayMatter enables students to voice and meet these needs.

Jeremy attends Columbia College in Harlem and Shah studies at Culver Academies in Indiana; both lead our team, which actively works to raise funds and awareness.

Who do we help?
We help NYC public high schoolers, but we’re expanding quickly. Contact us if you have an opportunity for us to expand.

Finance and legal
We value transparency and as a result we provide our financial and legal information.

Please contact us with your feedback, questions, and comments.

GrayMatter or greymatter?
GrayMatter comes from the Americanized spelling of greymatter, a major component of the central nervous system which assists sensory perception and is located in the cerebral cortex. As greymatter facilitates learning and higher thinking within each individual, GrayMatter aims to facilitate education within our society.
