

Theories of International Relations

G6801x Office hours: M,Tue, 11-12 Fall 2007
Rm. 1333 IAB
Professor Robert Jervis (rlj1@columbia.edu)
TA: Brooke Greene (bcg2104@columbia.edu)

This course reviews the main strands of the theoretical literature in international politics, which necessitates covering a lot of ground quite quickly and omitting many specialized topics. Books marked with * are available at Labryrith Books (512 W. 112th St.), all the material is on reserve at Lehman, and most of the articles are available online.

As you will see, the readings are extensive. I do not expect you to read all of them during the semester, but they should be read before comps. The reason that I do not produce a shorter list for the course only is that what you will want to read will depend on several factors, including your particular interests and what you have read before (I assume that many of you will be familiar with about 20-25% of the material, but it may not be the same material for all of you). I will go over the readings the week before they are assigned. The recommended sections are pretty much hit-or-miss, but provide bibliography that may be useful.

For the 10-page take-home exam, due on the last day of class, you will apply 2 or 3 theories to a case of your own choosing.
